FLOOR DEBATE

February 5, 2002 LB 429

SENATOR JANSSEN: That is the way the bill intend...started out, yes, um-hum.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Under pressure and discussion and criticism, it was dropped down to nine cents. Is that true?

SENATOR JANSSEN: That's true.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: And if fourteen cents was the original amount and it was dropped to nine cents, it was reduced by more than a third.

SENATOR JANSSEN: Yes, Senator Chambers,...

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Okay.

SENATOR JANSSEN: ...I agreed with the...with the Chairman of the committee and they wanted to drop it to nine. I said that would be fine.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Right, that it wouldn't be necessary to gouge the state to that extent. That's basically what was agreed, right?

SENATOR JANSSEN: No, I think if you took into consideration everything that is entailed in credit card machines, that is probably the actual cost.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Well, Senator Janssen, now you've introduced another element which I must go ahead and discuss while it's fresh on the griddle. If a credit card transaction is involved, the credit card company doesn't pay you, does it?

SENATOR JANSSEN: No, it costs us six cents...

SENATOR CHAMBERS: You...

SENATOR JANSSEN: ...per...an average.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...pay the credit card company. Isn't that right?
